

The grey line indicates the guideline for our spirit and the red line on the bottom indicates our actual work. The work we did tended to center around the end of the sprint rather than be concentrated throughout. Our velocity changed for the current sprint because of how we document our work, both on the github and on other sources. Since we divided the work up evenly and we had very few dependencies on others, we didn't rely on having certain tasks or user stories completed to follow the sprint since they were not as needed or used by others. In addition we were also slow on pushing and telling other group members we were done on tasks and user stories and we only gathered around towards the end to discuss and finalize.